Front-line doctors receive awards for their distinguished service in Iraq

More than a hundred military personnel have been honoured for their contribution to the medical care of the armed forces in Iraq by the Association of Anaesthetists of Great Britain and Ireland (AAGBI).

General Sir Richard Dannatt, former head of the British Army, presented the Pask Certificate of Honour to regular and reserve members of the Defence Medical Services today (22 January). The ceremony took place at the Queen Elizabeth II Conference Centre, London, where the AAGBI is holding its WSM London winter conference.

Named after Professor E A Pask, a distinguished anaesthetist and experimental physiologist in the Royal Air Force Medical Branch during World War Two, the awards were established in 1977 to honour the gallantry of a registrar anaesthetist in the Moorgate Underground Disaster.

They are given to individuals who have rendered distinguished service, either with gallantry in the performance of their clinical duties, in a single meritorious act or consistently and faithfully over a long period.

In his citation to the 113 men and women who have been honoured, Group Captain Neil McGuire, Defence Consultant Adviser in Anaesthesia and a co-opted member of the AAGBI Council, paid tribute to the anaesthetists, who all served in Iraq during Operation Telic, from March 2003 until June 2009.

“Consultants and trainees alike were mobilised to provide medical support to operations from the initial action until the conclusion of the mission” he said.

“During that time Medical Officers from the Royal Navy, the Royal Army Medical Corps and the Royal Air Force performed their duties with great skill and professionalism.

“Many personnel undertook their roles under fire and with great threat to their personal safety on a regular basis. On some days more time was spent lying on the floor sheltering from mortar and rocket attacks than was spent standing up, but despite this the task of treating the injured continued virtually uninterrupted.”

Two of the award recipients also shared their first-hand experiences of providing medical care on the front line with delegates during a special session on Iraq.

Col Peter Mahoney OBE, Defence Professor of Anaesthesia at the Royal Centre for Defence Medicine in Birmingham, focused on military trauma resuscitation.

“Trauma managed in the conflict setting is very different to standard civilian practice” he explained. “In the current conflicts, blast and ballistic injury mechanisms predominate which have demanded new approaches to casualty care.”

He stressed the importance of multi-disciplinary care teams and close liaison between experts on the front line and those providing care to casualties when they return to the UK.

Fellow award recipient Lt Col Tom Woolley RAMC, who joined the British Army in 1999, explored the problems of haemorrhage, one of the leading causes of death in modern-day conflicts.

He pointed out that although this is largely uncontrolled catastrophic haemorrhage, a large number of patients have clotting problems – known as ACOTS - which is thought to be due to trauma shock.

“Aggressive treatment of ACOTS can potentially improve morbidity and mortality and has a significant role to play in damage control resuscitation” he said.

AAGBI President Dr Richard Birks paid tribute to the courage and skill of Col Mahoney, Lt Col Woolley and the other award recipients.

“These brave men and women work behind the scenes, selflessly and tirelessly, providing high-quality healthcare in incredibly difficult circumstances” he says.

“They deserve our thanks, our admiration and the greatest respect for the work they do. That is why the AAGBI is so proud to honour its front-line colleagues today for their extraordinary dedication and courage.”
